CLASSICS

The Department of Classics at the University of Toronto is one of the largest in North America with over 20 faculty members and is internationally renowned for the excellence of its undergraduate and graduate programs. Our diverse faculty study all aspects of the Greek and Roman world: its literature, history, philosophy, art, archaeology and religion, from prehistory to the medieval period. Faculty are cross-appointed to the History and Philosophy departments, the Centre for Medieval Studies, the Centre for Comparative Literature, the Women and Gender Studies Institute, and the Graduate Centre for the Study of Drama, and work with the Jackman Humanities Institute, the Royal Ontario Museum, and the Archaeology Centre.

New Ancient History Programs

The Department is pleased to announce that it has recently launched new 1- and 2-year MA programs with a focus on Ancient History. These programs allow qualified students to participate in research seminars in Ancient History while also pursuing MA-level language training in either Ancient Greek or Latin, or both, depending on preparation. These programs also feature a rigorous introduction to historical methods and participation in a bi-weekly collaborative Ancient History seminar. In addition, the Department has also added an Ancient History stream to its Classics PhD program, which now features three tracks, including also Literature and Ancient Philosophy, the latter under the aegis of the Collaborative Program in Ancient and Medieval Philosophy (CPAMP).

Attractive funding packages are available for MA as well as PhD programs. We invite all interested applicants to apply by the deadline of 15 December 2015, by submitting an online admissions application through the School of Graduate Studies at:
